is made in Ireland. It is the product of Irish brains and enterprise. Proud as we are of that fact, we have preferred to seek support for THE MAX on its merits alone. Experience has shown there is no better polish made. It gives a really brilliant and enduring shine—quickly. With the smallest fraction of polish, too, That means economy. It is always moist in the tin—always ready for use. More economy. THE MAX preserves the leather and makes boots damp-proof.

Note: To get the best results always finish off with a pad or soft cloth.

That should be a sufficient answer to the trade unions concerned, unless, indeed, they contemplate setting up "a new kind of aristocracy." The Prime Minister, however, did not content himself with it. He argued our whole war policy on the plane of thought of that curious minority which, is some confused way, believes, or pretends to believe, that an equitable peace is to be had almost for the asking. He showed first that there is no half-way house between peace and war. "You might as well stop fighting unless you are going to do it well." To continue the war half-heartedly, to leave the men at the front without the reinforcements which they need urgently, is mere murder. Better than that, said Mr. Lloyd George frankly, "let us stop it." He ten explained the meaning of stoppage to those who seem to prefer that alternative. It happens that Germany has made, and is still making, its meaning brutally clear. Russia has tried the experiment of dismantling her Army and talking peace across its ruins, and the BROADWOOD, CHAPPELL, DUBLIN. THE IRISH PARLIAMENT.

In this volume of five hundred pages Mr.
Swift MacNeill has given us a history of the Irish Parliament from Poyning's Act of 1495 to the Act of Union, 1800. It is of 1485 to the Act of Union, 1800. It is very full and detailed, but is almost all germane to the subject, and will well reward the careful reading which must be given to it. The author's sympathics are decidedly on the anti-Unionist side of the story, but it is a side illuminated by names which are honoured by all sections of Irishmen.

which are honoured by all sections of Irishmen.

Mr. MacNeill devotes but a few pages to Irish constitutional history before 1496. The Irish Parliament had been in existence nearly two hundred years before this. The Assembly of 1297 contained representatives of the lesser clergy, the counties, and the liberties, and thus has a claim to be called our first Parliament, though it was not till 1350 that it was completed by the addition of twenty members from eleven towns. The survival in the Irish Parliament up to the Reformation times of representatives of the lower clergy sitting with the Commons makes an interesting contrast with the history of the English Legislature, from which this class of representatives fell away about 1332. Another contrast, a survival of a more embryonic stage, is the lack of a clear distinction between the various estates in Ireland; and another the frequent summoning of those interesting Great Councils (Magna Concilia) which were only semi-representative, and yet had full legislative powers.

The Irish Parliament, which was in existence almost a searly as that of England, and was in no come a daughter Assembly, had developed great powers by 1376. In that year Edward III, desiring to break the power of the Anglo-Irish nobles, against whom his policy had been directed for the most of his reign, ordered representatives to be elected by the lower clergy, counties, and towns of Ireland, and to attend before the King and his Council at Westminster. This was answered by a protest of the Irish Lords, Prelates, and Commons, who declared that, "according to the rights, privileges, and liberties which they had enjoyed from the time of the conquest of Ireland and before, they were not bound to send persons to the Parliament or Council of the King in England." The command of the Crown was never repeated, and this first attempt at a legislative union without mutual assent failed.

A remarkable historic parallel might be drawn between the period 1447-1495 in the history of the Irish Legislature and t Irishmen.

Mr. MacNeill devotes but a few pages in declaring war on German Atlantic and joined the Brit

FOOD PRODUCTION.

The year 1918 may or may not see an end to the lamentable contest in Europe. But, whatever happens, every indication points to the necessity for increased food-production. The inevitable scarcity of meat should be met as far as possible by developing the food resources of the soil. While it is the duty of the farmer to augment the cereal crops, it is no less the duty of every one possessing a garden to get as much food out of it as possible—every square yard should be made to yield its quota. Peas and beans are deserving of greater consideration than was generally deemed necessary last year, Should you be face to face with a meatless day a dish of either of these legumes might be found no bad substitute. Their nutritive value is in excess of that of beef. Don't omit a fair proportion of beet, parsnip, onion and root crops generally.

Avoid waste either by purchase in excess of your requirements or by unnecessarily thick seeding. Remember seeds were never so scarce. We have, however, covered your requirements, i.e., provided you send in your order in good time. Don't wait the advent of sowing time. There are many new claimants in the field. It will be "first come first served." If our catalogue has failed to reach you please drop us a post card.

The "Stock Exchange Year-Book" for 1918 has just reached us. The war has not affected the bulk or usefulness of this well-known work of reference, and Sir Thomas Skinner is to be congratulated on the 1918 volume, which runs to as many as 2,344 pages. The official record of joint atock companies registered continues to reflect the war conditions very acutely. In the year to December 31, 1936, there were only 3,393 registrations in England, Scotland, and Ireland, as compared with six and seven thousand in recent normal years. Moreover, the average capital involved in 1916 was only £14,800 per company, while in 1876, when the average capital involved in 1916 was only £14,800 per company, while in 1876, when the average capital was about £45,000.
